INTRODUCTION

BY

GENERAL SIR RONALD ADAM

CHAIRMAN OF THE BRITISH COUNCIL

The British Council was established in 1934 on the initiative of the United Kingdom Government. Although the Council is wholly financed by the U.K. tax-payer, it is an independent corporation under its Royal Charter and is strictly non-political.

Our aim is to interpret Britain in its broadly cultural aspects to all people not normally living in these islands.

Much of the Council's work lies in the field of adult education, in establishing British libraries overseas, in giving the latest information about progress in scientific research, social development, education, letters and the like.

But the Council seeks also to make known overseas our past and present achievements in music, drama and the fine arts. Thus it has sent collections of paintings, sculpture, crafts, prints and drawings to many parts of the world including Canada and the United States.

The more we in the United Kingdom know about Australians, how you live and what you do, the better for us; but that is a task for Australia. The British Council wants to tell you of our cultural life in the British Isles: one side of an essential exchange.

So we have recently established an office in Australia under Mr. Charles Wilmot and now have pleasure in offering to the people of Australia this exhibition of a selection of the Wakefield Collection, shown for the first time this spring at the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

FOREWORD

THE late Lord Wakefield, shortly before his death, presented to the British Council, through the late Sir Lionel Faudel-Philips, first Chairman of the Fine Arts Committee, the sum of £3,000. This generous gift was intended to be used for the purchase of contemporary British water-colours, drawings and prints to form a permanent collection for circulation in foreign countries and throughout the British Dominions and Colonies.

In pursuit of this purpose Mr. Campbell Dodgson, formerly keeper of Prints and Drawings at the British Museum, has for the last nine years visited exhibitors, dealers and studios in a constant search for new works. His great enthusiasm and his unrivalled experience were placed unreservedly at the service of the Committee and the result is probably as representative a collection of British work in the fields of watercolour painting and the graphic arts generally as it would be possible to get together.

WATERCOLOURS AND DRAWINGS

The task was, for obvious reasons, more difficult in the case of watercolours than of prints. The more famous an artist is, the more eagerly is his work acquired not only by private collectors but by public galleries; and, as watercolours are unique objects, every work purchased narrows the field of choice to later collectors. It is no easy task to get together a collection, in modern times, which shall represent every watercolourist and draughtsman of importance and represent them by something which is on a level with their best work. Whether this has been accomplished or not in the present instance, it is an ideal which has never been lost sight of for a moment. For a collection of this kind is an ambassador, an accredited representative of England, and it is all important that nothing should be included unless it is worthy of the excellent work which has been done by British artists during the past generation.

The watercolours will probably make the first claim on the visitor's attention. From the works of such veterans as Philip Wilson Steer, and such 'old masters' as H. B. Brabazon to the works of such comparatively young artists as Robin Darwin or Raymond T. Cowern, the exhibition covers an artistic activity of the best part of a century, although in selecting the older artists choice has been restricted to those in whose work was to be seen the germ and inspiration of the later schools.

The drawings cover, if not in time at least in manner, an even wider field. There are drawings for sculpture or as studies for painting; there are drawings which have been made for their own sake and exist in their own right. Walter Richard Sickert, Sir Muirhead Bone and Augustus John are the veterans in this part of the exhibition. Of course a great many more artists of distinction were working in Great Britain during the period in question than it has been at all possible to represent in the present collection. It is hoped none the less that the drawings selected will give some idea of the great variety of technique and purpose and the high level of quality of British draughtsmanship in modern times.

PRINTS

Very few prints are pulled in single examples; hardly any are, therefore, unique, and it is possible to have considerable liberty of choice and even to take as one's standard of selection prints which have already been chosen for the principal public collections.

The tradition of graphic art in Great Britain is a very strong one, at least since the middle of the eighteenth century, when the great English masters of mezzotint had such a monopoly of the process that the technique itself was known as la manière anglaise.

In the aquatint process Englishmen were genuine pioneers and exquisite work was produced in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. In the great revival of original etching which took place towards the middle of the nineteenth century, although France took the lead, England played an honourable and indeed essential part. Reproductive wood-engraving is outside the scope of the present exhibition but it is none the less true to say that the patient craftsmanship of the 'Men of the Sixties', no less than the spontaneous art of Bewick and Blake is part of the foundation of modern wood engraving in England.

In lithography Britain has only come forward in the present century. We have nothing in the nineteenth century to compare with the work of the great French masters. But in modern times, especially in the work produced by those who have mastered in their entirety the technical processes involved, Britain has placed herself in the forefront of lithographic art.

There has been also a notable revival of line engraving, no longer as a mere handmaid to book-illustration or reproductive work generally but in its own right as a craft of great beauty and power. Linocutting is a newcomer in the field of the creative arts, but it has already established itself both for purposes of instruction in schools and for its own particular qualities and effects.

Particularly interesting in all these media are the many successful attempts to produce colour prints. These now undoubtedly form one of the most attractive features of the present exhibition which will, it is hoped, stimulate interest in the various techniques represented and serve to show the high level which has been achieved by British artists throughout the entire field of the Graphic Arts.
